Faith and Reason in the Quest for Knowledge

The human mind is a marvel in itself. It gives us a unique ability to think intelligently, solve problems and survive against odds. Although it has some limitations, it is responsible for self-awareness and our ability to explore truths and speculate upon the nature of life and the universe. Because of that, one can formulate and conceptualize complex ideas, ideals, concepts and theories and discern things to know their distinct qualities and relative value.

Your mind has many similarities with the universe. Just as the universe, it is an open-ended system with an infinite capacity to be flexible and work in any direction or in whichever way you desire. It contains in itself infinite probabilities and possibilities, with which you can foresee problems, estimate possibilities and find opportunities to improve yourself or your chances of success.

Our rationality is also subject to numerous limitations, which result in confusion, delusion or muddled thinking. One of the main reasons for it is the lack of emotional maturity or intelligence. Emotions interfere with our thinking and our ability to deal rationally with problems and situations. Under their sway we may err in our judgment or make hasty decisions. Because of the way our brains are built, we usually respond to difficult situations with emotions before we collect our thoughts and think rationally. Therefore, to make right decisions, you must have control over your emotions and stay calm. For that, you may practice the following.

1. By being in the present
2. By establishing eye contact and paying attention, or being mindful
3. By taking your decision according to your observation and experience rather than beliefs
4. By cultivating knowledge
5. By disputing your irrational thoughts
6. By overcoming cognitive errors and mental filters such as prejudices and assumptions

Faith and reason serve different purposes in our quest for truth. We do not have to depend exclusively upon reason only. Within the realm of the objective reality, we may depend upon reason, but when it comes to transcendental truths and abstract ideas, which reason can neither establish nor repudiate, we can rely upon faith.

We cannot always rationalize our actions. For example, we may not always be able to say why we like or dislike certain things or why we choose certain people for friendship or relationship. There may be causes of such decisions, but the same causes may not always prompt us to engage in similar decisions. Sometimes we have to trust our hearts and go by your convictions, or what experience may suggest, even if it is contrary to popular opinion or rational thought.

We can be rational, but at the same time we can also believe in ourselves, in our actions and decisions or in the goals we chose or the relationships we establish. It is by using both of them as paddles, and the mind as the boat, we can navigate our way in the ocean of life.

QUOTATION

Some people wish that their life will work out the way they want it to be. But let me ask you a simple question, do you like to watch a movie that has a predictable plot? My guess is, NO.

I am not a normal person. I am living in a normal body, but my mind is not normal

Prince Prasannan (B. Sc)

Some people work to be happy. Some people go to the gym to be happy. Some people build wealth to be happy. Can you see a pattern here? Everyone wants to be happy in life. Only the path they use is different. This is indeed one of the greatest life quotes because of the deep meaning it holds.
