Taking Down The Nodes of First Sparkle,

The sky Blooms and it rains.

Frightening, Beautiful and aroma- Speaking through Darkness & Light,

All I wonder to see my shadow

In Flash of the Light

Dear, I spoke

Will you be with me?

When the sun is over my head will you be with me when it is,

Dark and everything at rest

Will you be with me?

The Nodes Rims down - to twinkle. And All I breathe a life full of Melancholy ...

And Deep Pain!

- Shubham Singh
BALLB-VIII Sem

The poem "Taking Down The Nodes Of First Sparkle" is a beautiful, abstract piece that leaves room for interpretation. Here's one possible explanation:

The poem seems to be about the passing of time and the inevitability of change. The first line, "Taking down the Nodes of First Sparkle," could be interpreted as a metaphor for the end of something that once shone brightly or was full of promise. The "nodes" could refer to the points of light in the sky, perhaps representing stars or planets, that are now being taken down or fading away.

As the nodes come down, the sky blooms and it rains, which could represent a period of growth and renewal after a loss or change. The next few lines evoke a sense of both fear and beauty, perhaps suggesting that change can be both frightening and transformative.

The speaker then wonders if someone will be with them through both the good and bad times - when the sun is shining and when it's dark and quiet. This could represent a desire for companionship or support during times of change and uncertainty.

Finally, the nodes "rim down - to twinkle," which could suggest that even though something has ended or changed, there is still a glimmer of hope or possibility. However, the speaker is left with a sense of melancholy and deep pain, perhaps reflecting the bittersweet nature of change and the difficulty of letting go.
