RIGHT TO INFORMATION

The basic feature of every democracy is openness, transparency. As India being world's largest democracy the Right to Information acts as a potential weapon in the hands of general public, which can be used to keep check on the governmental bodies. The Right to Information has emerged as a practicable tool that can be used to access information held with the administrative or public authority. In context to India Right to Information is not only Statutory Right but also fundamental right. The main objective of RTI act is to make governance more accountable and transparent. With its objective to promote transparency in working of every public authority, it covers wide range of authorities, both at the central level and state levels.

The journey of seeking information from government was not easy in India. The functioning of judiciary and legislative was transparent, the legislature shows it by the way of debate and judiciary by adopting natural justice principle, giving both the parties a chance of hearing in a democratic way. But Executive maintained secrecy by keeping its resolutions and records confidential.

The citizens' right to get information gained power when the United Nations adopted a charter of Human Rights providing everyone "the right to seek and receive information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers". But hindrance to the disclosure of information was restricted by the Official Secrets Act, enacted in 1889 and amended in 1923. The revolution of seeking information was only possible in India after the enactment of Right to Information Act, 2005.

The Struggle for the RTI started in a small dusty town in Rajasthan called Beawar, a people's movement was launched to fight against corruption. In the backdrop of slogans like "Hamara paisa, Hamara hisab" and "Ham Janenge, Ham Jiyenge", Mazdoor Kisan Shakti Sangathan (Association for the Empowerment of Workers and Peasants), a People's Organisation undertook the bold initiative to arouse the common people about their right to seek information which eventually led to legislation called 'Right to Information Act, 2005. This dharna, which went on for 44 days, ultimately resulted in the Right to Information Act in 2005, which now allows every citizen to get information and access government records.

India as party to International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), India was under an international obligation to effectively guarantee right to information as per Article 19 of the ICCPR. The formal recognition of the right to Information as legal right occurred more than two decades before it came into force, when the Supreme Court of India ruled in State of U.P. v. Raj Narain that the right to information is implicit in the right to freedom of speech and expression explicitly guaranteed in Article 19.
