Students are expected to achieve high standards of excellence. The teaching methods include–lectures, case studies, seminars, webinars, assignments, live projects, group discussions, business games, educational excursions, role plays, simulation exercises, and Industrial visits. The emphasis is on involving the students in learning and helping them to relate concepts and theories to business realities.

The program enables students to acquire skills to identify and deal with complex problems of management. Predictive and real life exposures, such as real trading/ or plant level operations are being provided.

Presence of Local Needs of the Business: The course curriculum reflects the local needs of the business environment.

Exposure to Social Sector: Our course curriculum is not only loaded with profit–corporate sector, whereas the problems of social enterprises or social sector are also discussed in classroom. Public Policy Issues Incorporated: Management course structure is not only loaded to firm level constraints, complexities and suggests frameworks and solutions for firm level managerial problems but also entangled with multiple public policy issues such as health, education, gender decimation, transport, telecommunication, financial services and so on. The managerial perspective of public policy issues are discussed in the current curriculum.
